Some concept of narrative seems to be creeping into all the arts nowadays but at least in works prepared for the screen it means telling a story. Although it's easy to think that story telling applies mostly to fiction, it is just as relevant to documentary productions. The book is divided into three parts. The first is aimed at explaining just what story is, from the basic idea of a story to an examination of how one can be creative, even in a presentation bound to facts. The second part discusses some of the elements of developing a documentary story from research to editing. The third part is a series of interviews with the makers of documentaries, emphasizing how they developed the stories in the work, although occasionally spilling off into other areas. I found this last section particularly interesting from the range of documentarians from those who carefully plotted their films to those who actually eschew plotting. To a great extent the author relies upon examples drawn from recent documentaries, including, for example a "close viewing" of Morgan Spurlock's "Supersize Me." The author also provides references to web sites and books that illustrate and explain further details of how particular documentaries tell their stories. (Occasionally some of the references didn't seem very useful, but I don't blame the author for that.) The best way to use the author's instruction is by viewing the actual films and concentrating on how they develop their story line. This is a basic approach to the idea of storytelling. It is written in clear and simple language. I'm not enough of an expert to know if there are important subjects that have not been covered, but what is here rings true and accords with my experience.
